Dear Mr. Michael K. Powell:

My name is Harvey Lam and I am strongly advocating that downloading music should be illegal. From various New York and Los Angeles Times newspaper articles, I have acknowledged that the public is aware that lawsuits have occurred and those who failed to abide by the law were punished rightfully. I feel that reprimanding those who are stealing music off of the Internet is still not getting the message across that they need to stop.

Fortune Magazine have reported that companies such as Kazaa, Grokster, and Morpheus are still allowing file sharing and day by day, artists are losing the revenue and credibility that they deserve. Recent news I found from New York Times are that the Recording Industry Association of America has attempted to sue these companies, but it seems to be impossible to get rid of these file sharing systems. Niklas Zennstrom, one of the creators of Kazaa, says that the only way the system can be shut down is if every user elected to disable his program. I feel that this claim can be overpowered since the material that they are passing back and forth is copyrighted material. Threats to sue those with mass media mp3 files seem to not be a threat at all. I popular story that is also seen in Fortune Magazine is that the Recording Industry Association of America is sending intimidating copyright infringement warnings that pop up on the computer screens of people who are providing songs for others to copy, but these suspects of piracy do not even flinch.

As a suggestion to those who have the power to enforce downloading music being illegal, a threat to disconnect all home Internet users should be made. After this occurs, a system of file sharing that includes a monthly payment similar to America Online should be made. The New York Times has reported on the first success story of online music purchasing done by Apple. It is a website called iTunes, which charges a buck for each downloaded song. Three million songs have already been downloaded, which is impressive since the only computers that are compatible with iTunes (Macintosh computers) are 1% of the computers in America. If a system developed with such a limited amount of customers can be successful just as Apple, I feel that other actions can be made to stop copyright infringement online. The money can go to the artists who deserve the credibility.

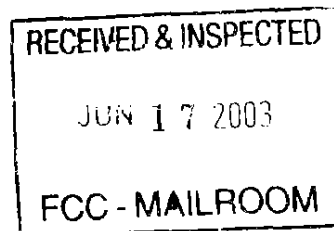

Sincerely,

Ms. Abernathy

Remember the phrase "in the PUBLIC interest"? Wasn't that the reason for the founding of the FCC?

Since you were one of the recipients of over 2500 trips in seven years -- trips that were paid by the big media giants you have already reaped a profit-- and probably much more.

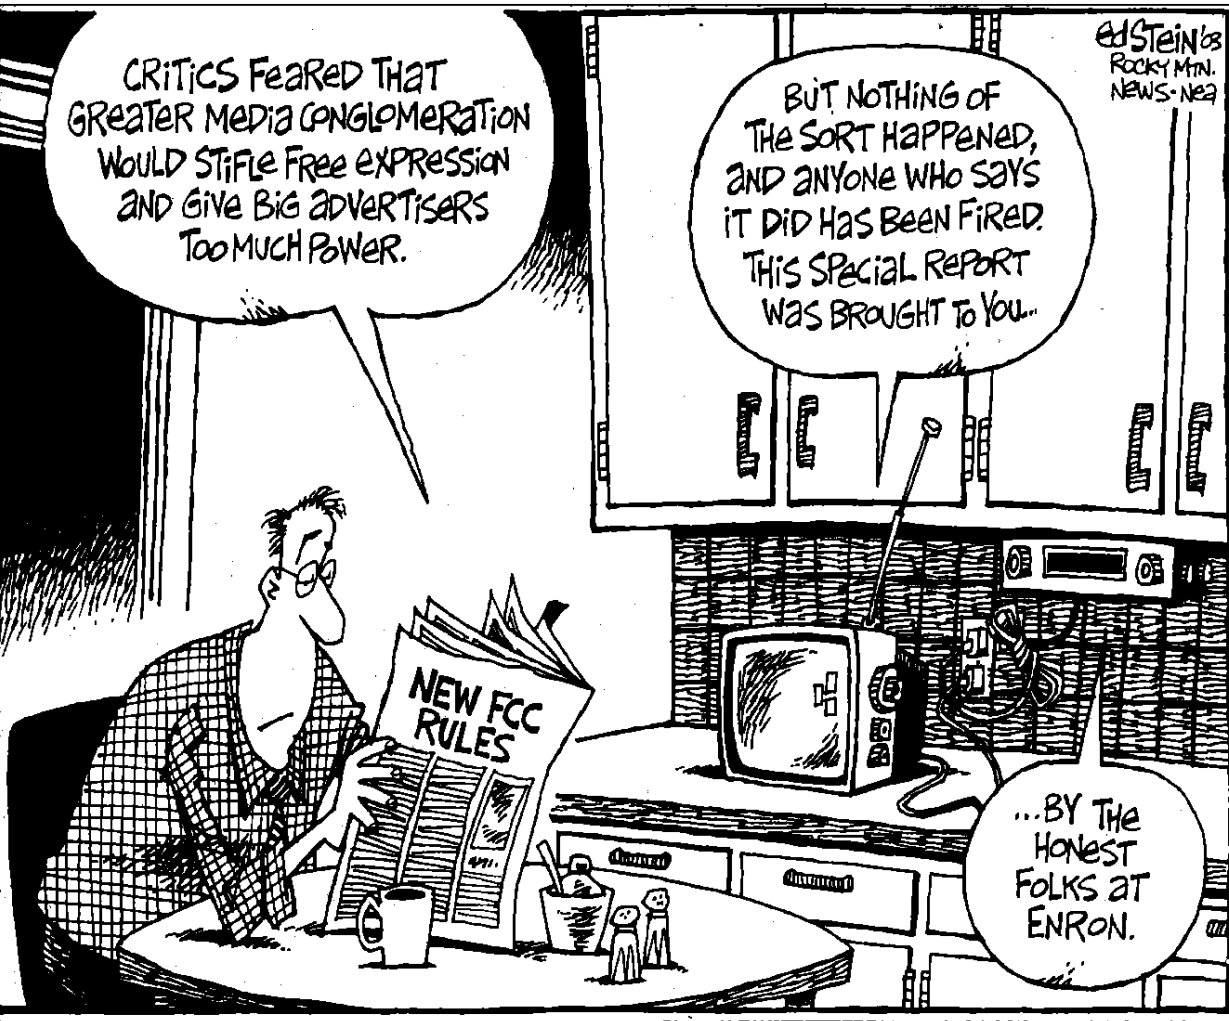

What is the difference between a prostitute and a pimp? You would fit either definition.

In disgust,

Mrs. Phyllis Hazekamp

Dear Mr. Copps:

We strongly disagree with your decision to allow for more media consolidation. Please consider reversing your decision. I want diversity in my new and your ruling will hinder that.

Sincerely,
